As the producer of food, without which the city cannot survive for a day, the country has been indispensable. It still is, but the world trade in food gives people the illusion that if you don't produce food at home, you can always import. As a consequence, primary industries are rapidly losing profitability, and a result is the "hollowing" of the Japanese countryside.	False		1996-12-02	TX 4-373-625
